依下文回答第 46 題至第 50 題

Children who experience social anxiety—feeling discomfort or distress in social situations—or who are socially incompetent are particularly at risk for developing dependence on electronic media. This is true whether the preferred agent be the Internet, video games, or a smartphone. The more a child hides behind a screen, the more socially awkward he or she becomes, creating a self-perpetuating cycle. In contrast, a shy child who continually works at overcoming social anxiety is likely to overcome it. In the past, the strong desire to belong to a social group during adolescence helped override resistance to social interaction, which would lessen over time simply due to practice. Nowadays, socially anxious or awkward children and teens aren't forced to practice face-to-face and eye-to-eye interaction because some of their social needs are met online. Thus, in socially anxious children, the ability to tolerate the physical presence of others never builds, and "walls" are erected instead to keep the child feeling safe. An adolescent with somewhat poor social skills in high school can easily become reclusive as a young adult, spending more and more hours online and less and less time interacting in real life. This pattern makes it increasingly harder to make and keep friends. Relationship problems show up at home, too; research indicates that the more time a child spends using the Internet, the less healthy the parent-child relationship becomes. Thus, social incompetence and screen-time represent another bidirectional relationship.

- 46 Which of the following words best describes socially incompetent children?
 (A) Shy. (B) Playful. (C) Practical. (D) Anxious.
- 47 In the past, what did teenagers with poor social skills do to improve their relation with others?
 (A) They were forced to participate in sports to get more contact with people.
 (B) They made good use of letters and telephone calls to develop friendship.
 (C) They took part in more group activities to fit into the circle of their friends.
 (D) They studied hard to get higher grades and to make themselves interesting people.
- 48 What are possibly the "walls" that the socially anxious children erect to make themselves feel safe?
 (A) Books and bookshelves.
 (B) Parents, teachers, and friends.
 (C) A home and a comfortable bedroom.
 (D) Video games, the Internet, and smartphones.
- 49 What is the problem that this passage is likely to address about teenagers?
 (A) Drug abuse. (B) Academic stress.
 (C) Body image anxiety. (D) Addiction to electronic devices.
- 50 According to this passage, which of the following statements is true about the children behind the screen?
