In 1996 the Wall Street Journal ran an article on the nuisance of satellite navigation devices, cellphones, and other such appliances in the wilderness. All this high-tech _____ 12 _____, it appears, is drawing up into the mountains people who perhaps should not be there. At Baxter State Park in Maine, the journal reported, one hiker called up a National Guard Unit and asked them to send a helicopter to airlift him off Mount Katahdin because he was tired. On Mount Washington, two very demanding women called the mountain patrol headquarters and said they could not _____ 13 _____ the last mile and a half to the summit even though there were still four hours of daylight left. They asked for a rescue team to come and carry them back to their car. The request was refused. A few days later, another hiker called and requested a helicopter because he was a day _____ 14 _____ and was afraid he would miss an important business meeting. The article also described several people who had got lost with satellite navigation devices. They were able to report their positions as 36.2° north by 17.48° west or _____ 15 _____, but unfortunately did not have the faintest idea what that meant as they had not brought maps or compasses or, evidently, brains.

The motion picture is one of two major arts to have evolved within modern history—the other art being still photography, upon which the motion picture is based. (Television is here regarded simply as a means for distribution and exhibition of moving images accompanied by sound.) We can only guess what first prompted people to express themselves in the various older artistic media, or how early modes and conventions developed and disappeared as aesthetic and social functions changed. The motion picture, however, is clearly the child of nineteenth-century scientific curiosity and technological ingenuity; it has grown up under our twentieth-century noses.

In fact, the most important of the motion picture's original reasons for being had nothing to do with its artistic potential. The theory underlying the motion picture was demonstrated in a succession of optical toys. Its tools and materials were invented out of a desire to make visual records of life and to study the movements of animals, including humans. Its capacity to provide peep-show entertainment attracted paying customers to what scientists and inventors had made available. Later, as the novelty of lifelike movement began to pale, the technicians and entrepreneurs who had discovered how to project moving images onto screens stumbled onto an old interest latent in audiences—the story. They began to offer simple narratives in a new form. As in the novel, the play, music, or dance, an ordering of events into a beginning, middle, and end was required in even the simplest motion picture.

- 21 What are the two major art forms developing within modern history?
- (A) Motion picture and novel (B) Motion picture and television
(C) Motion picture and peep-show (D) Motion picture and still photography
- 22 Which of the following did NOT prompt the first invention of the motion picture?
- (A) Directors' desire for storytelling (B) Scientists' desire for visual records of life
(C) Technicians' desire for technological ingenuity (D) Customers' desire for peep-show entertainment
- 23 In which way is the motion picture similar to the novel, the play, music, or dance?
- (A) It provides sound. (B) It provides narratives.
(C) It provides moving images. (D) It provides visual records of life.
- 24 What does the underlined phrase “to pale” in the second paragraph mean?
- (A) To turn white (B) To lose appeal (C) To become dark (D) To draw attention
- 25 According to the passage, which of the following statements about the motion picture is true?
- (A) The motion picture was first produced because of its artistic potential.
(B) The motion picture grew out of the twentieth-century scientific curiosity.
(C) The development of the motion picture is based on the invention of television.
(D) The aesthetic and social functions of the motion picture have changed through time.
