Some people may turn their noses up at natural remedies, but there is one in particular that is attracting the attention of the scientific and medical fields. Tea tree oil, derived mainly from the leaves of Melaleuca alternifolia, has become a popular commodity. As you may have noticed, it has become a popular ingredient in many shampoos, soaps, and cleaning products. But it is the tea tree's healing properties that have been sparking interest of late.

Although tea tree oil, or melaleuca oil, may strike you as a relatively new item on shelves, it has actually been used for thousands of years. Melaleuca alternifolia is a native to New South Wales, Australia, where the aboriginal people used the crushed leaves of the tree to treat cuts and burns. In the 18th century, Captain Cook saw native Australians making tea with the leaves and came up with the name "tea tree." In the 1920s, Australian doctors discovered that the oil of the tea tree was an effective antiseptic. It soon became a household remedy, and during WWII, all Australian soldiers were issued tea tree oil in their first-aid kits.

Following the war, the substance fell out of favor as new medical discoveries were made. However, since the 1980s, interest in tea tree's properties has grown again. New studies suggest tea tree oil might effectively treat acne, bacterial and fungal infection, dandruff and mites. If the research holds up, perhaps even more products will contain tea tree oil in the near future.

請依下文回答第 36 題至第 40 題：

When Saray Cambray Alvarez, a 13-year-old in North Carolina, and several other teenagers get to the fields at 6, they pull a black plastic garbage bag over the body and punch holes through the bags for their arms. They are protecting their skin from leaves dripping with nicotine-tinged dew. This is because the plants' nicotine often dissolves in rain and dew, which can cause vomiting, dizziness and irregular heart rates, among other symptoms.

Saray sometimes has trouble breathing in the middle of all the heat, humidity and leaves, and often feels weary during her 12-hour shifts when she moves through the rows to pluck unwanted flowers or pull off oversize leaves for the harvest. Saray is not alone. The New York Times reports that in other states like Kentucky, Tennessee and Virginia, children as young as 7 are working on tobacco farms and many suffer from the symptoms of acute nicotine poisoning.

For years, public health experts and federal labor officials have sought to bar teenagers under 16 from the tobacco fields, citing the grueling hours and the harmful exposure to nicotine and other chemicals, but their efforts have been blocked. Three years ago, Hilda Solis, then the labor secretary, proposed declaring work in tobacco fields and with tractors hazardous—making that type of work illegal for those under 16.

During the re-election in 2012, the Obama administration withdrew Ms. Solis's proposal after encountering intense opposition from farm groups and Republican lawmakers. Agricultural organizations said the move would hurt family farms and make it harder for young people to learn farming skills. But some proponents still hope to revive the tobacco part of the proposal once the midterm elections in 2014 are over.

To proponents of higher age limits, however, dangers lurk in many corners. The tobacco fields pose a whole environment of risk. It's the nicotine, the pesticides, the heat, the long hours, the pressure they get from employers. Last year, a study conducted by Human Rights Watch found that three-quarters of young tobacco workers interviewed had suffered nausea, dizziness and rashes. And most tobacco farms did not even have portable bathrooms. "There's nothing good about this job, except that you get paid," said Esmeralda, who earns $8.50 an hour.

 (A) Child labors on tobacco farms.
 (B) Treatment of nicotine poisoning.

 (A) seats (B) tobacco plants (C) nicotine dews (D) wild flowers
- 39 Which of the following is NOT a major tobacco-producing state?

- 40 Why does Saray wear a black plastic garbage bag over the body?
 (A) To collect the tobacco leaves at work.
 (B) To keep warm in the cold early morning.
 (C) To observe the rules of the tobacco companies.
 (D) To keep away from the potential harm of nicotine.
